Speaker Bartley at B.S.C.

Speaker of the House, David Bartley, addressed Bridgewater State College faculty and students in the Demonstration Room last Tuesday. The attendance was better than most lectures; the Demonstration Room was almost filled. The Speaker, applauded by the audience as he entered the room, was accompanied by President Rondeau.

Speaker Bartley began by describing himself as a "product of public education," stating that he graduated from UMass. He went on to speak about the Mass. State College System, naming BSC with its "old tradition and brand new campus" as a "flagship" of the State college system.

Bartley spoke of two bills allowing for the appropriations of funds for BSC. Announcing a bill that allows for the appropriation of one half million dollars for the new athletic field, the Speaker commented, "If the Patriots have a stadium, at least the Beavers can have a playing field of their own." Bartley also commented on the consideration of a bill that will initiate at BSC a new laboratory training school.

The Speaker then briefly listed some recent achievements of the Mass. legislature. He spoke of the legislature's protest of the Vietnam War, its 50 million appropriation for the preservation of inland wetland and its position as 3rd state legislature to allow students to sue polluters. Bartley also mentioned the legislature's efforts to make drug laws more conforming to today's needs, to treat alcoholism as a disease not a crime and, finally, to raise money for the elderly and bilingual programs for educating non-English speaking Americans.

Speaker Bartley concluded by saying that the legislature provides millions for the furthering of public higher education. He spoke of the youth as being Massachusetts' greatest natural resources and Bartley declared that education is an investment in that reservoir. Bartley then urged students to become involved in politics, to choose a party and make an impact by working within the party structure. "The critics of America," Bartley said, "would usually talk that work.

A question and answer period followed the lecture.

The first question, asked by S.G.A. President Joel Wasserman, concerned the lack of funds needed for the health facilities at BSC. Wasserman pointed out that as the school increases in size, the health facilities remain the same. Bartley answered by saying that the million infrastructural probably hasn't gotten access to all. Then while the audience nodded at him and I assumed he just dropped a story for the people in the room to laugh. Many Black people went away saying what a "hot shit" that Gregory is.

This weekend, a youthful band of "volunteers" appeared on our quiet campus in numbers. These "things" consist of certain freedoms, responsibilities, privileges, etc. Generally, it follows that as a person matures psychologically, he also matures mentally. Hence, the older one becomes, the wiser he also becomes. It is through this increasing amount of knowledge that we are better able to comprehend and appreciate the things around us, or might I say, should be able to appreciate and better comprehend...

Up to now there seems to be an insistence that contradicts this trend of thought!

Inside Chinese Universities

By Kim Woodard

After the Cultural Revolution, China's universities were closed for two years. When they reopened, the students were divided into two groups: the "sent-down youth" and the "local students." The "sent-down youth" were the children of high-ranking officials who were considered to be bourgeois. The "local students" were the children of ordinary workers and peasants. The two groups were separated and treated differently. The "sent-down youth" were sent to the countryside to work as farm laborers, while the "local students" were allowed to continue their education in the city. The two groups were not allowed to communicate with each other.

BOOK REVIEW: THE ENGLISH INFANT SCHOOL

By Lillian Waters, Parents magazine, November 1971.

Professor Waters is widely acknowledged to be of the University of Illinois at Urbana. Here is an excerpt from her book, "The English Infant School," in which she describes the current state of education in England.

"The English Infant School is a system of education in which the teacher is the central figure. The teacher is expected to be a expert in child development, and to be able to adapt the curriculum to the needs of each individual child. The teacher is also expected to be a good behavior manager, and to be able to control the classroom environment.

The curriculum of the English Infant School is based on the belief that children learn best through play. The teacher provides a variety of activities for the children to explore, and encourages them to be creative and individualistic. The teacher also provides opportunities for the children to learn about their own emotions and feelings, and to develop self-awareness.

The English Infant School system is designed to provide an environment in which children can learn and grow. The teacher is the key figure in this system, and is expected to be skilled in child development and behavior management. The curriculum is based on the belief that children learn best through play, and the teacher provides a variety of activities for the children to explore and be creative. The teacher also provides opportunities for the children to learn about their own emotions and feelings, and to develop self-awareness. The English Infant School system is a positive and supportive environment for children to learn and grow.
