After a weekend full of homecoming festivities, it seemed most students closed their books for the fall and turned their attentions to a few of the social activities sponsored on campus. Come Monday, reality hit as we had to return to a week's worth of homework and papers. The football team is faced with that situation as they head to the next game against the MACASC teams from Westford, North Adams St., and Bates. They all "are" teams as well as ours, if you have to become MACASC teams.

Foreign Languages
Should you know one?

By Nancy DePonte
Staff Writer

The foreign language requirement that has been part of the curricula of this college for many years, is a topic for the Board of Trustees to review and possibly recommend changes. The Board should consider the usefulness of the requirement and its current form.

The foreign language requirement presently is as follows: Every student who enrolls at this college is required to complete four credits of a foreign language before graduation. The foreign language courses are offered in Spanish, French, and Russian. Students may also take courses in German, Italian, and Portuguese as electives.

The requirement is based on the assumption that exposure to a foreign language will enhance a student's understanding of other cultures and increase their ability to communicate with people who speak other languages. It is also believed that knowledge of a foreign language is a valuable asset in today's global economy.

However, the requirement has come under criticism from some students and faculty members. Some argue that the requirement is too burdensome and does not provide enough flexibility to fit the needs of students. Others believe that the requirement is outdated and irrelevant in today's world.

The Board of Trustees should carefully consider the pros and cons of the foreign language requirement and make recommendations that will benefit the students and the college as a whole.

Godlis Paints It Black

By Susan F. Stetlehy
Professor of Art

"This isn't no party. This isn't no dance. This isn't no feeling around" (lyrics, Talking Heads)

In reviewing the photography exhibit by David Godlis in the Anderson Gallery (Art Build­ ing, through Nov. 3), a visual repetition of both the familiar and the unfamiliar is strikingly evident, asking that each of the fifty-six works, mostly black and white but firmly anchored to both causal social and formal properties. The exhibit "Punk Pantheon: Night Club Scenes and Rock Portraits" features both on the ground and the stills made featuring largely on the punk subculture that was highly visible in the 1970s, at places like CBGB. The exhibition, a photographer's tribute to CBGB long before its closure, is an assemblage of the punkers and the unfamiliar is strikingly evident. The exhibit offers more at peace with the past. Godlis offers his photographs as the Dead Boys, Ms. Harry, and the others sensitive souls emerge. While photos of Richard Hell and Joe Recamia might chronicle the early origins of the punk music movement, the subtle mood of David Byrne and, towards another extreme, the near "superstar" appearances of Richard Hell introduce the present, frozen within the present. So much is disarming smile. Just a closing note - why do manufacturers of sneakers (I still prefer the term over "athletic footwear") so often are mentioned. When the question is raised of the brutal, not swag, of Milk Street, we look for a moment of intense views of Tom Wolfe when we need him?

Stop Making Sense is the Talking Heads second live album; actually a soundtrack to a concert movie. (As of this writing, I keep wondering if it was necessary for Talking Heads to release this album, which is the concert movie, on video.) For the Heads fans, this is one of the best cuts on this side. It's faster and more exciting than the studio versions. David Byrne stages and yelps at his best here and the live version is really an improvement over the original.

The other songs are repeats of the studio versions. As usual, I have no idea what the talking heads are saying. Also, with the limited edition of the album comes a booklet with photographs from this forthcoming live version.

Fitch from his recent Emmy award, Ian Dun's outrageous Garfield has been slated to star in one of the first specials of the new season in "Garfield In The Rough" on the CBS television Network Friday, October 26 1984 (9:00-10:00 PM, ET).

This new animated special features the pin-striped fan car vacating subways in the wild with new front, and rear windows (alas!), and a fierce panther on the line.

The same winning team from United Media Productions will collaborate together last season's blockbuster -- "Garfield In The Stripkins". Len Wein's famous comic also appeared on CBS, drew an audience of 45 million viewers and earned a $225,000 of the available audience in its time period.

Executive producer Jay Payner says the new network special "Garfield's forerun show yet. It's sure to delight his millions of fans and entertain every member of the family."

The character of Garfield, the world's most famous cat, and his cartoon strip of the same name is distributed by United Feature Syndicate and appears in more than 1,500 newspapers worldwide.

The series for "Garfield In The Rough" is being written by Jeff Berke, and Phil Roman, director of "Garfield In The Stripkins" is the director of the series of United Features Syndicate.

Garfield is the creation of Jimmy McCarthy and is the property of the Howard company.

This is a great song to begin with, and the live version is even better. I love the lyric to this song: "You may say to yourself, 'My God, what have I done?'" Along with "Psychokiller", this is one of the best cuts on this album - its exciting and charged with emotion. "What a Day That Was" is a personally inspiring time, it's an aside moment of the same with the transnational. "Stop Dancing" is the next cut, and "Big Boys Don't Cry" is a another extreme, this near the "superstar" appearances of Richard Hell.

I keep wondering if it was necessary for Talking Heads to release this album, especially since they did release The Name Of This Band Is Talking Heads (a double live album) only a couple of years ago. Of course Stop Making Sense is a must for the die-hard Heads fans, and it really is a long time to have a Psychokiller, "Once In A Lifetime", "I'm On A Boat", and "Take Me To The River". But if it wasn't for an upcoming movie, it wouldn't have reached this level. To release this album, especially since then, some material is played in the same manner as the studio versions. I really think that this album, although it is good, could have been better.

"This isn't no party. This isn't no dance. This isn't no feeding sound" (lyrics, "Talking Heads").

In viewing the photography exhibit by David Godlis in the Andrews Gallery (Art Building, New York, November 2), a visual narrative of both the familiar and the unfamiliar is strikingly evident, asking that each of the fifty-six works, mostly black and white, be mentally combined for both causal and formal properties. The exhibit, "Paints Night: Black Scenes and Black Rock," presents both on the ground and the stereo ride focusing largely on the post-suburban scene that was so highly cultivated in the 1960's by Bob Dylan, the Rolling Stones, and the likes. In the end, the show suggests a stark dichotomy between the photographic black-and-white and the more blackened and somewhat swirling, yet often blurry and soft images. The most striking page, however, is the one that Godlis has chosen as the center of his exhibition, "Garfield" by Garfield.

We're interested in how we expect to "use" the Russian (and even consider ourselves important to them) when we can even speak their language, much less teach them to the masses?

The job market, which does and each and every one of us, is becoming increasingly and professionally bilingual. The telephone company will hire you accordingly. It's necessary if you speak a second language, and public affairs departments almost are the only one where you can really make a name for yourself. In many towns in Massachusetts and Rhode Island, it's almost certain to be hired if you speak Portuguese. And you're listening. Politically majorly does not expect to get a job in the State Department if you're not at least bilingual.

Admittedly, the study of a foreign language is difficult, and linguistic ability is acquired only after a great deal of time and effort. Many people contend that it is not possible to learn another language at this age, citing studies which have shown that language ability begins to fade in early life. But that is only true. The brain does not stop learning at the age of 30. It is possible, though perhaps not easy, to acquire a second language even after having reached the great old age. One professor here on campus, in fact, learned Russian in the Maxwell Library. He was twelve years old. He is now a professor there and is still teaching. And as well as four other languages, he

Due to the continued cooperative efforts of Bentley College and Brockton Area Transit the College now offers transportation for handicapped students with physical disabilities. This service is made possible through the efforts of the Graduate School and the Office of Veterans/Disabled Student Services.

The van, formerly operated by the Athletic Department, was renovated and adapted for handicapped service during the latter part of the term. The van was painted with college colors and was equipped with a hydraulic wheelchair lift (thanks to the staff of Mr. Dick Kellner and his Boys). The van is available to students who have permanent physical disabilities who are pre­pared to board the van on Thursdays and are domiciled in need by Ms. Nancy Clay, who were all instrumental in making the van a reality.

Dias and Baker Named Captains
By Mike Storey Staff Writer

New Bedford’s Mark Dias has been named captain for the 1984-85 Bridgewater State College basketball team. This is the third year in a row that Mark has received such an honor.

According to Dias, the Lady Bears in last season’s 35-3 overall record were a super individual team on and off the court. "We had a very strong "team" guy, but leads by example. He should be one of our court guards in Division III this year."

West Palm Beach, Florida’s Cathy Baker has been named captain of the 1984-85 Bridgewater State Women’s Basketball team.

"Cathy is probably the hardest worker on the team" comments,” head coach, Beauger. "She works hard for everything she gets, rather than just being handed things. She’s the perfect example of a team captain."

The Lady Bears are a part of the MASCAC All-conference team.
