A Mother’s Courage

Jeremy Bragg

Follow this and additional works at: http://vc.bridgew.edu/undergrad_rev

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation
Available at: http://vc.bridgew.edu/undergrad_rev/vol4/iss1/30

This item is available as part of Virtual Commons, the open-access institutional repository of Bridgewater State University, Bridgewater, Massachusetts.
Copyright © 2008 Jeremy Bragg
I stare in disbelief: “No. No. This can’t be happening. It’s all a dream. Close your eyes; it will go away,” my subconscious quickly commands. I turn away from it all, not ever wanting to see this ungodly sight again, but it is everywhere, playing like a movie in my head. “Turn it off! Stop! Please stop!” I hear myself scream. The show continues to roll, flickering now just as the old movies did, but now the sound is growing louder, deafening. I hear myself let out another shriek of terror, and I wake. “Hey man, do you wanna sleep over tonight?” Tom asked excitedly.

“Yea, that sounds great! I’ll take the bus to your house and call my parents when they get home,” I said. I got my schoolbooks and bag and ran off to my next class as the bell began to ring. “I can’t wait” I thought to myself as I took a seat, “This is going to be the best sleepover ever.” The first day of school ended with a sense of accomplishment and a certain release of anxiety. I called my mother as soon as I knew she would be home, and she agreed to let me sleep over at the Fisher’s home.

Just as I had predicted, the night was filled with amazing games, including army and hide and seek. We played with a bunch of the neighborhood kids and had a blast. Afterwards we sat down for the best type of supper: pizza, of course, just the thing any kid would want at a sleepover. We put in a newly released movie we had just gotten from Blockbuster, and we began to settle in for the night. The clock ticked and tocked until the midnight bell rang. We grew tired and went into Tom’s room to settle down. Tom and I shifted the pillows, blankets, and comforter accordingly to make what I would call a bed but many would call a messy pile of stuff. I don’t remember much after that; we fell asleep quickly from our exhausting day.

I began to quiver from a cool draft that had begun to flow in. “A window must be open,” I thought to myself, but I could see no motion from the curtains. The frigid air began to slide down my spine like a dribble of cold molasses. My mind slowly became numb, and my fingers felt brittle. I looked around hoping to find the source of this strange cold front, but again I found nothing but a motionless room with no answers. I tucked under the covers of my makeshift bed and tried to warm up. My throat dried up and began to ache. “I hope I’m not getting sick,” I told myself. I jumped up, still shaking, and headed toward the bathroom. Suddenly, a loud bang startled me. Curiously, I crept toward the noise, hoping it was just nothing but a fallen bag or book. A nervous chill ran down my back. I could feel my face begin to burn as if I were embarrassed. Then I heard a crack, the same sound you would hear when a cowboy’s whip make as he hit his horse. I slid against the wall waiting in despair for someone to come help me. I heard something metal drop and cling on the ground.

My heart began to beat rapidly. I tried to slide over to the kitchen door but my legs refused to move. I managed to reclaim control over my legs and headed for the door. With each and every step I took, my mind cautioned me to take two back. Just as any kid would do, I threw caution to the wind, and, reaching the kitchen door, I peered through the small crack in the door to see two silhouettes. One immensely taller then the other.

The mumbling turned clearer as if someone had turned the antenna to fix the static on a TV. I remained still. My breathing grew heavier. I tried to make out the two figures but had no luck. “Where is it? Show me!” a deep, masculine voice commanded. “It’s in the living room,” a quivering feminine voice replied, “that room.” She pointed toward me, scared and trembling. A lump built up in my throat; I could hardly breathe. I had to drag myself across the room for my legs had again been lost to the fear. I managed to get behind a chair in the corner of the room, as if it were a game of hide and seek. A giant charged through the door and surveyed the room. “There it is,” he whispered under his breath as he spotted the large television. I glanced over to the kitchen door to see the shadow of a woman on the phone.

“No son. It wasn’t just a dream,” my father claimed. At once I was bombarded with questions by my parents about the night. “I’m fine,” I could remember saying repeatedly, as the flashbacks and nightmares consumed my mind. I could so vividly remember Mrs. Fisher’s body lying still on the ground covered in a pool of blood. These disturbing scenes had been permanently stamped into my memory.